Professor of Economics at IESE Business School

PhD in Economics from the University of Minnesota

I am a Professor of Economics at IESE Business School. I have dedicated most of my professional life to doing research, teaching, and advising in macroeconomics.

My latest academic papers explore the macroeconomic consequences of pension system reforms. I have published in some of the leading professional journals in economics such as the Journal of Political Economy and the Journal of Monetary Economics, and I have co-authored two papers with Edward C. Prescott, who was awarded the Nobel Prize in Economics in 2004, unfortunately with another one of his coauthors. I am also the author of two macroeconomics textbooks “Macroeconomics: First Concepts” and “Macroeconomics for Nearly Everyone.”

I lecture regularly to my students at IESE and in industry meetings and other professional meetings. My latest conference topics are the Future, the Global Economy, Managing Change and Disruption, Bitcoin, the Euro, and Pensions.

I have consulted very briefly for the Economic Bureau of the President of Spain, and for the Spanish Ministry of Industry and I have served on the board of Martinsa-Fadesa, a large construction company, on the strategic committee of Consulnor, a capital management company, and on the editorial board of El Economista, an economics daily. I make frequent appearances in Spanish national and international media, including the Cadena COPE, Atresmedia, the BBC, the Financial Times, The Economist, CNN, and Bloomberg.
